‘B’ level essay – a very good example:

James Harris was a Little League coach; however, he was reprimanded for touching a player’s shoulders to calm him down, and he was rebuked as a child molester. However, he didn’t think that it was a molestation; moreover, he thought that “We have reached a sad state of affairs if men cannot discipline boys by grabbing them by the shoulders, or congratulate them after a home run by hugging them.” Also, I agree with this opinion because children can feel many good emotions from physical contact. Therefore, physical contact is necessary for children.

Nowadays, adults can’t hug children when they congratulate them; moreover, when players misbehave, a coach just yells at them. Miss physical contact is a sad state of affairs because children can feel encouraged from body contact. For example, when I was a junior high school student, I belonged to Japanese fencing club. Before a game my master always patted my on the shoulder and said that good luck. He encouraged me, and I could get energy from his hands. I felt encouraged by his body contact; therefore, physical contact is good for children.

Children can feel not only encouraged but also relieved from physical contact. James Harris guessed that “Soon we may even hesitate to take hold of a child’s arm to guide him across a busy street.” It’s bad for children because they feel lonely by miss body contact. For instance, when I was five years old, I got lost in the crowd, so I felt uneasy and lonely. However, a passerby spoke to me, and he looked for my mother with me. Moreover, he clasped my hand, so I felt the warmth of his skin and heart; also, I felt relieved. Therefore, physical contact is required for children.
Children sometimes can’t understand what is wrong without body contact. For example, when I was a child, my father was a strict. When I made my sister cry, he gave me a spank on the bottom, and then I fully realized that I was wrong. I don’t think it was a ill-treatment; on the contrary, it was needed for my upbringing. However, some people say that James Harris’s action was a ill-treatment or a molestation although when the child started kicking the bench, splintering one of the planks, he ran over and told him to stop. However, the children ignored him and continued kicking, so he had no choice but to grab the boy by the shoulders and shoved him down on the bench to stop kicking and breaking the bench. If he didn’t stop the boy, he would continue kicking the bench and break it. It is a crime to break a public thing, so stopping children’s wrong is adults’ responsibility.

In conclusion, body contact is good for children because they can feel good emotions from it. For instance, children can feel encouraged and relieved; also, they can understand what is wrong. Therefore, physical contact is needed for children.
